Jennifer Tow, IBCLC

An IBCLC since 1996, Jennifer Tow has established a reputation for working with breastfeeding families to resolve complex feeding issues, relying on information gathered from across a wide field of study. Through her clinical experience and research, and inspired by a 15-year fascination with epigenetics, she has come to focus her interest in the area of gut health and healing, exploring the profoundly far-reaching implications of this work for breastfeeding dyads. Jennifer works with clients internationally, primarily through Skype, specializing in helping dyads presenting with a wide range of concerns associated with compromised gut function, structural restrictions and tongue-tie. She integrates a myriad of holistic modalities, such as nutrition, herbs, home remedies and energy medicine, often collaborating with other holistic practitioners in mentoring the families she works with. Jennifer views breastfeeding as primal nutrition and is currently writing a book and developing a curriculum on Holistic Practices in Lactation. She is a founding member of the IATP (International Affiliation of Tongue-tie Professionals).

Dr. Sharon Vallone, DC, FICCP

25 years as a chiropractor with a special interest in maternal health, lactation, pediatrics including developmental pediatrics and special needs children. Besides her private practice, Dr. Vallone has spent the last 15 years traveling to Louisville, KY to volunteer at the Kentuckiana Children's Center, founded in 1956 by Dr. Lorraine Golden, who, believed that children with challenges should be given every opportunity to thrive in a safe and nurturing multidisciplinary healthcare environment.

Dr. Vallone's position on faculty of postgraduate education in Chiropractic Pediatrics motivates her to continue learning to keep up with her students. As a published author herself and co-editor of the Journal of Clinical Chiropractic Pediatrics, she is constantly encouraging others to write case reports and publish research findings believing that their efforts will help support others in her field develop their clinical expertise.
